Mexican Issues in Political Campaigns
of United States

Mexican issues, which are playing so important a part in the present political campaigns in the United States, have before this American and foreign readers. Almost from the beginning of the Mexican Republic up to the period of the war with Mexico the relations between the neighboring nations were often strained. James K. Polk was elected to the presidency largely because of his stand on the question of the annexation of Texas, which was claimed by Mexico. The war which was the outstanding feature of his administration was unpopular in many sections of the North, and the White partisans manifested slight enthusiasm over the victories achieved by American arms. The military record made by Gen. Zachary Taylor in the conflict with Mexico was solely responsible for his election to the White House. Although the United States annexed a vast area of Mexican territory following the struggle, many people were dissatisfied and a number of political and semi-political organizations, notably the Knights of the Golden Circle, plotted the extinction of the Mexican Republic and the annexation of the whole country by the United States.

Opposition to the Mexican war was partially responsible for the eclipse of the political ambitions of one of the ablest statesmen and orators of that period. Senator Thomas Corwin, whose famous speech in the Senate denouncing the war ranks among the masterpieces of American oratory, was born in Bourbon county, Ky., just 122 years ago, July 29, 1794, but removed to Ohio, and was governor of the Buckeye State before his election to the United States Senate. Although he was afterwards Secretary of the Treasury under Fillmore and minister to Mexico under Lincoln, he suffered greatly in popularity because of his stand against the Mexican war. He was denounced as lacking in patriotism, and although he had previously been widely mentioned for the presidency, his opposition to the war ruined his chances in that direction.

His speech, which was long recited by schoolboys and was translated into many tongues, is not without significance at the present time, and is worthy of repetition. In part he said: "I have an American Senate and House of Representatives nothing to do but to obey the bidding of the President, as the mercenary army he commands is compelled to obey under penalty of death? No! your Senate and House of Representatives were never elected for such purposes as these. They have been modeled on the good old plan of English liberty, and intended to represent the English House of Commons, who curbed the proud power of the King in olden times, by withholding supplies if they did not approve the war."

"It was on this very proposition of controlling the executive power of England by withholding the money supplies that the House of Orange came in; and by their accession to the throne commenced a new epoch in the history of England; distinguishing it from the old reign of the Tudors and Plantagenets and those who preceded it. Then it was that Parliament specified the purpose of appropriation, and since 1688 it has been impossible for a king of England to involve the people of England in a war, which your country has deprived the moral sense and blunted the otherwise keen sagacity of our people. What has been the fate of all nations who have acted upon the idea that they must advance? Our young men chasing this notion with a fever but totally mistaken zeal. They said it by the mysterious name of 'destiny.' 'Our destiny,' they say, 'is onward,' and hence they argue, with ready sophistry the propriety of pushing upon any territory and any people that may be in the way of our future advance. Respected as the classics have grown classical; some ambitious student of antiquities has helped them to a patron saint. They have wandered back into the desolated Pantheon, and there, among the polytheistic relics of that 'pale mother of dead empires,' they have found a god whom these Romans, centuries gone by, baptized 'Terminus.'

"Sir, I have heard much and read somewhat of this gentleman Terminus. Alexander the Great was a devotee of this divinity. We have seen the end of him and his empire. It was said to be an attribute of this god that he must always advance, and never recede. So both republican and imperial Rome believed. It was, as they said, their destiny. For a time Roman Terminus did advance. Under the eagles of Rome he was carried from his home on the Tiber to the farthest East on the hand, and to the far West, among the then barbarous tribes of western Europe, on the other. But at length the time came when retributive justice had become a 'destiny.' The despised Gaul came out to the continent of Goth, and Attila, with his Huns, answers back the battle-shout of both. The blue-eyed nations of the North, in succession or united, pour forth their countless hosts of warriors upon Rome and Rome's always advancing god Terminus.

"Whoever would know the further fate of this Roman deity, may find ample gratification of his curiosity in the luminous pages of Gibbon's Decline and Fall. Such will find that Rome thought, as you now think, that it was her destiny to conquer provinces and nations, and no doubt she sometimes said, as you say, 'I will conquer a peace.' And where now is she, the Mistress of the World? The spider weaves his web in her palaces, the owl sings his watch-song in her towers.

"I have lately heard so much about the dismemberment of Mexico, I have looked back to see how, in the course of events, which some call 'Providence,' it has fared with other nations engaged in this work of dismemberment. I see that in the latter half of the eighteenth century three powerful nations, Russia, Austria and Prussia, united in the dismemberment of Poland. They said, too, as you say, 'It is our destiny.' They wanted room! Doubtless each of these thought, with his share of Poland, his power too strong to fear invasion, or even insult. One had his California, another his New Mexico, and the third his Vera Cruz.

"A few years pass, and we hear of a new man, a Corsican lieutenant, the self-named 'armed soldier of dem-
